POLICE ACCOUNTABILITY

regarding violence against women

Discussion

Police accountability and victim’s constitutional rights regarding the withdrawal of sexual offences cases in the criminal justice system. This topic will explore the legal framework which informs the decision making of the police in the investigation and withdrawal of cases, the rights of victims to reasons for withdrawals, the possible application of administrative procedures, access to information, and the police use of discretion in usurping prosecutorial function. The panel will consider possible interventions as well as legal reform to hold police accountable in decision making.

Facilitator: Mandy Mudarikwa

Mandy Mudarika is currently employed as an attorney working in areas of gender, refugee’s rights, children’s rights and civil society organisations at the Legal Resources Centre (LRC) in Cape Town. She holds a Bachelor and Master of Law in Human Rights Law from the University of Cape Town, South Africa. She was admitted onto Western Cape Town High Court Attorneys Roll in August 2011 and her work experience includes strategic litigation, general litigation, appearances in refugee internal tribunals, advocacy, training, publication and lecturing. She is currently writing on the application of the Refugees Act, regional and international conventions by the refugee status determination officers on LGBTI applications for asylum based on sexuality and gender
