A. INTRODUCTION

1. The Women's Legal Centre is an African feminist legal centre that advances women's rights and equality through strategic litigation, advocacy, education and training. We aim to develop feminist jurisprudence that recognizes and advances women's rights. The Violence Against Women programme's goal is that there is an accessible legal system that takes account of, and supports, the needs of women impacted by violence, that provides optimal services and protection by the state and private entities and reduces secondary victimisation. The programme's objectives are: ensuring that there is a legislative framework to address violence against women which is compliant with international and constitutional obligations; ensuring that the state has implementation plans in place to action legal frameworks and policies; holding the state and private entities accountable in the implementation of laws and policies, and in the development of due diligence standards relating to violence against women.

C. SECTION 18 OF THE CRIMINAL PROCEDURE ACT

Constitutional Court judgement in Levenstein and Others / Estate of the late Sidney Frankel and Others CC No 170/17.

3. The proposed amendment follows litigation¹ in the South Gauteng High Court and the Constitutional Court challenging the constitutional validity of section 18 of the Criminal Procedure Act 1977 to the extent that it bared, in all circumstances, the right to institute a prosecution for all sexual offences, other than those listed in sections 18(f), (h) and (i) after the lapse of a period of 20 years from the time when the offence was committed.
4. These exclusions include rape, compelled rape (sections 3 and 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 32 of 2007 (“SORMA”)), certain offences provided for in section 10 of the Prevention and Combatting of Trafficking in Persons Act 2013, and using a child who is mentally disabled for pornographic purposes as contemplated in sections 20(1) and 26(1) of SORMA.
5. In the litigation referred to above (“Levenstein”), the Women’s Legal Centre appeared as First Amicus Curiae in the South Gauteng High Court matter (case no. 29573/16), and as the Fourth Respondent in the Constitutional Court matter (case no. 170/17).
6. In its judgement, the High Court declared the section 18(f) as inconsistent with the Constitution, and therefore invalid as it pertains to the bar on prosecutions of all sexual offences other than those listed.

¹ Levenstein and Others / Estate of the late Sidney Frankel and Others CC No 170/17 South Gauteng High Court No 29573/16

7. The court ordered a 'reading in' to section 18(f), adding the words "and all other sexual offences, whether in terms of common law or statute".
8. The applicants made application to the Constitutional Court for confirmation of the High Court order.
9. The matter was heard in the Constitutional Court on 14 November 2017, and judgement was handed down on 14 June 2018.
10. The order of the Constitutional Court was as follows:
 1. The declaration of constitutional invalidity of section 18 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 made by the High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Local Division, Johannesburg is confirmed.
 2. The order is suspended for 24 months from the date of this order to afford Parliament an opportunity to enact remedial legislation.
 3. During the period of suspension section 18(f) of the Criminal Procedure Act is to be read as though the words "and all other sexual offences whether in terms of common law or statute" appear after the words "the Criminal Law (Sexual Offences and Related Matters) Amendment Act, 2007, respectively."
 4. Should Parliament fail to enact remedial legislation within the period of suspension, the interim reading-in remedy shall become final.
 5. The declaration of invalidity is retrospective to 27 April 1994.
 6. The first respondent's appeal against the costs order of the High Court is dismissed with no order as to costs.
 7. The second respondent is to pay the costs of the confirmation proceedings.

Section 3 Prescription of right to institute prosecution (Prescription in Civil and Criminal Matters (Sexual Offences) Amendment Bill [B22 – 2019]

11. In the previous version of the Bill, a distinction was still being made between certain sexual offences for the purposes of criminal prescription.
12. The Women's Legal Centre made submissions to the Department of Justice and Correctional Services in April 2019 arguing that to differentiate between sexual offences and to exclude certain sexual offences from prescribing after 20 years is totally contrary to the Constitutional Court judgement and its final order which lifts the prescription of 20 years to institute a prosecution for all sexual offences, whether in common or statutory law.
13. WLC welcomes the latest draft before the Committee and supports the current formulation of the section.

Retrospectivity and the effect thereof

14. Both the Constitutional Court (CC) judgement and the Bill refer to the retrospective nature of the amended section 18.
15. The CC judgement declares that the invalidity of section 18 is retrospective to 27 April 1994, while the Bill deems the amended section 18 to have come into operation on 27 April 1994.
16. The essence of the two are the same in application.
17. With section 18 coming into operation on 27 April 1994, several issues arise and must be addressed.
18. The right to institute a prosecution vest in the NPA.
19. In terms of the 'current' section 18 (prior to the CC judgement) the NPA's authority to exercise that right was limited to 20 years, other than for certain offences for which there was no limit.
20. The default position on retrospectivity is found in Ferreira v Levin NO and Others; Vryhoek and Others v Powell NO and Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC) where the court accepted that the principle objective of constitutional invalidity. The principle states that the law declared to be unconstitutional is considered to be invalid from the date of its enactment or the date the Interim or Final Constitution came into force.²

21. The court held that:

[27] A pre-existing law which was inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution became invalid the moment the relevant provisions of the Constitution came into effect.

and

[28]..... the conclusion that the test for invalidity is an objective one and that the inception of invalidity of a pre-existing law occurs when the relevant provision of the Constitution came into operation.

22. The principle was again explained in Ex parte Women's' Legal Centre: In re Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council 2001 (4) SA 1288; 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC) at paragraph 3 as follows:

[3]... Thus, in the case of an inconsistent statute antedating the Constitution, the inconsistency arose on 4 February 1997, when the Constitution came into force and its norms were superimposed on the existing legal system. If a statute enacted after the inception of the Constitution is found to be inconsistent, the inconsistency will date back to the date on which the statute came into operation in the face of the inconsistent constitutional norms. As a matter of law, therefore, an order declaring a provision in a statute such as that in question here invalid by reason of its inconsistency with the Constitution, automatically operates retrospectively to the date of inception of the Constitution.

23. Therefore, it is submitted that the declaration of invalidity of section 18(f) by the CC would usually have rendered it invalid to the extent of its inconsistency from 4 February 1997 when the final Constitution came into force.

24. However, the CC departs from this position by providing that section 18(f) is invalid from an earlier date of 27 April 1994 when the Interim Constitution came into force.

25. Post 27 April 1994, any decision taken by the NPA to institute (or not) a prosecution relying on the old section 18(f) would be inconsistent with the prosecution and invalid. In addition, any decision made by the NPA post 27 April 1997 to prosecute any sexual offence would not be limited to 20 years from when the incident occurred.

² Supra at paras 27 - 30

26. But pre - 27 April 1994, section 18(f) unamended remains valid and operative. The declaration of invalidity does not apply and continues to operate in its unamended form. The right of the NPA to institute a prosecution for any sexual offence (other than the sexual offences listed in the unamended section 18) committed prior to 27 April 1994 lapses after 20 from when the incident occurred.
27. The declaration of invalidity does not apply to the period before 27 April 1994. The declaration cannot reach further back in time than the date of the Interim Constitution.
28. No provision was made by the CC or is made in the current Bill for the resurrection of the right to prosecute that has lapsed before 27 April 1994. Therefore, the NPA cannot prosecute sexual offences not listed in the current section 18 that occurred before 27 April 1974.
29. The right to prosecute an offence which occurred before 26 April 1974 has therefore lapsed.
30. This gives rise to the continued arbitrary distinction between certain sexual violence victims. Once again, depending on the nature of the sexual offence and when it occurred, certain sexual offences continue to prescribe after 20 years when they committed prior to 27 April 1974.
31. Practically, this anomaly can be demonstrated by the following example: If A were indecently assaulted on 26 April 1974, the right of the NPA to institute a prosecution would have lapsed on 26 April 1994; the NPA can therefore not prosecute the case in 2019. If, however, A, were indecently were assaulted on 27 April 1974, because the NPA's right to institute a prosecution was declared unfettered from 27 April 1994, the NPA may proceed with the prosecution of that indecent assault in 2019.
32. There are still situations where a sexual offence was perpetrated before 27 April 1974, and where both the victim and perpetrator are still alive. By denying the victim to opportunity to report the sexual offence and barring the NPA from instituting a prosecution unfairly discriminates against that victim.
33. The reasons for the delay in reporting the matter by the victim are numerous and have been accepted by the CC³, and cannot be disputed.

³ Levenstein supra at para 53, 57-58

34. In addition, a perpetrator who committed a sexual offence prior to 1974 may have escaped detection and arrest at that time, only for DNA to identify him 40 years later. According to the proposed amendment the NPA would be barred from instituting a prosecution against this perpetrator. This indicates the absurd situation where a perpetrator would enjoy 'immunity' from prosecution only because he managed to avoid detection for more than 20 years.

Proposed drafting solutions to the unfair discrimination resulting in the implementation of the Bill in its current form regarding retrospectivity

35. For there to be relief for all victims, whether a sexual offence was perpetrated against them before or after 27 April 1974, the section would have to include an express provision reviving the right of the NPA to institute a prosecution for a sexual offence perpetrated prior to 27 April 1974.

36. It is submitted that section 18 of the CPA be amended to include one of the following is included:

- (i) The right to prosecute an offence which lapsed prior to the operation of section 1(f) is revived; or*
- (ii) This section revives the right to prosecute any offence which lapsed prior to the operation of section 1(f) on 27 April 1994; or*
- (iii) Notwithstanding subsection 18(2), the right to prosecute an offence which lapsed prior to the operation of section 1(f) is revived.*

D. SECTION 12 OF THE PRESCRIPTION ACT 68 OF 1969

37. WLC acknowledges that the purpose of the Bill before Parliament, as it pertains to both criminal and civil prescription of sexual offences, is to bring the law in line with the CC judgement in Levenstein.
38. As with the proposed amendment to section 18 of the Criminal Procedure Act, where we have set out our concerns regarding the application of retrospectivity above, we submit that the amendment to section 12(4) of the Prescription Act also has implications in application regarding retrospectivity. We will address this below in more detail.
39. While the focus on this amendment is to bring the section in line with principles established in Levenstein, the WLC would appreciate the opportunity to address the Portfolio Committee on a second aspect of civil prescription as it pertains to sexual offences, that of the constitutionality of time bar provisions on the institution of civil legal proceedings.

Distinction between types/categories of sexual offences for the purposes of civil prescription

40. Section 1 of the (Prescription in Civil and Criminal Matters (Sexual Offences) Amendment Bill [B22 – 2019] amends section 12 of the Prescription Act 68 of 1969 to include all sexual offences, in terms of common law or statute, be subject to the prescripts of section 12(4).
41. Section 1 recognises, in line with the principles established the CC judgement in Levenstein discussed in detail above, that for the purposes of prescription, and more specifically the conditions set out section 12(4), that there may not be any distinction made between sexual offences. This recognition by the legislature in the Bill is welcomed by the Women's Legal Centre.

Section 12(4) of the Prescription Act

42. In terms of section 11 read with section 12(1) of the Prescription Act 68 of 1969, civil debts prescribe three, six, fifteen or thirty years from the date the debt is due.
43. The Prescription Act sets out certain circumstances where prescription will not commence to run. Section 12(4) provides prescription shall not commence to run in respect of a debt arising from the commission of an alleged sexual offence during the time in which the creditor is unable to institute proceedings because of his or her mental or psychological condition. This is based on the principle that prescription does not run against one who is unable to act. This principle finds expression in the common law maxim 'contra non valentem agree, non currit praescriptio'.

44. Prior to the introduction of section 12(4), a debt arising from a sexual offence would become due once the victim / survivor had actual knowledge of the identity of the perpetrator or was deemed to have knowledge because they could have acquired the knowledge by exercising reasonable care.
45. This was the state of the law when the Supreme Court of Appeal considered the plea of prescription in *Van Zijl v Hoogenhout*⁴.
46. The effect of the judgment was to expand the ambit of section 5(1)(c) of the Prescription Act as it then was (now section 12(3)) to include situations where a person had actual knowledge of the facts and identity of the perpetrator, but not 'meaningful knowledge of the wrong' or knowledge that the responsibility for the action lay with the defendant
47. The effect of the Van Zijl judgment was to create an additional ground upon which a person could argue that a debt had not fallen due and prescription had not commenced to run. The Supreme Court of Appeal had incorporated this new ground into section 5(1)(c) (what is now section 12(3)) as part of the general requirement that a person has knowledge of the identity of the debtor and facts giving rise to the debt. This 'knowledge' was interpreted to mean 'meaningful knowledge' and an appreciation of where responsibility for the wrong lay.
48. Parliament in 2006, however, elected to create an independent provision for cases involving civil debts arising from sexual offences. The motivation for introducing section 12(4) was an acknowledgment that debts arising from sexual offences require special treatment, coupled with the recognition that injustice can ensue when a period is allowed to prescribe through a debtor's own conduct thus undermining the principle of fairness to a creditor.

⁴ [2004] 4 All SA 427 (SCA)

Retrospectivity

49. Section 10(1) provides that a debt shall be extinguished by prescription after the lapse of the [relevant prescription] period.
50. This is similar to section 18 of the Criminal Procedure Act which provides that it is the “right to institute a prosecution for any offence” which lapses after the expiry of the prescription periods. The offence itself does not prescribe but rather the right to do something about it.
51. Section 12(4) provides that prescription shall not commence to run in respect of a debt arising from the commission of an alleged sexual offence during the time in which the creditor is unable to institute proceedings because of his or her mental or psychological condition. Section 12(4) makes no express provision for its retrospective or retroactive application and operation.
52. However, the proposed amendment provides for the section to come into operation on, and have retrospective effect to, 27 April 1994. This means that section 12(4) will apply to any debt arising from the commission of a sexual offence after 27 April 1994.
53. If the victim of a sexual offence can satisfy the requirements of section 12(4), the time bar of 3 years will only start to run once she is able to institute proceedings.
54. Section 12(4) will not have application to debt arising from sexual offences before 27 April 1994. In matters which occurred prior to 27 April 1994, the law at the time of the incident will apply.
55. As highlighted above regarding the concerns with retrospectivity as it applies to section 18 of the Criminal Procedure Act, the effect is that it gives rise to the continued arbitrary distinction between certain sexual violence victims. Once again, depending on the nature of the sexual offence and when it occurred, different laws apply and regulate the civil claim. The exceptions contained in section 12(4) will not apply to victims who were sexually violated prior to 27 April 1994.

Constitutionality of time bar provisions on the institution of civil legal proceedings in sexual offences

56. WLC has obtained an opinion from counsel⁵ on the constitutionality of time bar provisions with specific reference to sexual offences. The submissions below draw extensively from this opinion.

General:

57. The Prescription Act is the primary, but not the only, piece of legislation that imposes a time bar on the institution of legal proceedings against a defendant.

58. There is a long line of cases from the Constitutional Court considering the constitutionality of time limits imposed by other legislation for the determination of disputes before a court or tribunal⁶. These cases provide a useful framework to assess the constitutionality of time bar provisions and the relevant factors in any balancing of interests. In Mohlomi v Minister of Defence the Court held that the appropriate test required that the Court consider the availability of a real and fair initial opportunity to exercise the right taking into account the circumstances of the class of case in question.

59. There has never been a direct, facial challenge to the constitutionality of the Prescription Act. However, when interpreting and applying the Prescription Act, the Constitutional Court has accepted that prescription periods imposed by the Act limit the right to access to justice in section 34 of the Constitution.

60. In Links v ME for Health, Northern Cape 2016 ZACC 10, the Constitutional Court accepted that the operation of the provisions of the Prescription Act limit the right to access to justice in section 34 of the Constitution. This is because prescription prevents a dispute between two parties from being resolved by a court of law.

61. In Makate v Vodacom (Pty) Ltd (CCT52/15) [2016] ZACC 13; 2016 (6) BCLR 709 (CC); 2016 (4) SA 121 (CC) the Court emphasised that section 39(2) must be invoked when a court is called upon to interpret the provisions of the Prescription Act because the provisions implicate constitutional rights. The Court held at para 90 that “It cannot be disputed that section 10(1) read with sections 11 and 12 of the Prescription Act limits the rights guaranteed by section 34 of the Constitution.”

⁵ Adv. Frances Hobden and Adv. Claire Avidon, Johannesburg Society of Advocates, Thulamela Chambers.

⁶ Mohlomi v Minister of Defence 1997 (1) SA 124 CC; Moise v Transitional Local Council of Greater Germiston (Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development intervening) 2001 (4) SA 491 CC; Road Accident Fund and Another v Mdeyide 2011 (2) SA 26 CC; Potgieter v Lid van die Uitvoerende Raad: Gesondheid, Provinsiale Regering, Gauteng 2001 11 BCLR 1175 (CC)

62. In each case, the Court has been at pains to point out the legitimate government purpose of prescription periods.

63. The Law Reform Commission has commented that prescription serves the following policy objectives:

“The primary objective of prescription is the achievement of legal certainty and finality in the relationship between a debtor and a creditor, with the emphasis on protecting a debtor against the unfairness of having to defend stale claims.

Further to this, the rules of prescription promote the timeous exercise of rights. In this regard however, although the rules of prescription are meant to quicken the diligence of a creditor, they are not meant to operate punitively and mechanically; thus personal factors relevant to a creditor’s failure to enforce a right timeously are usually taken into account for the purpose of delaying the onset or the running of prescription.

They are also aimed at enhancing judicial economy and efficiency in the administration of justice. This is best served when parties are obliged to have their disputes adjudicated upon promptly, while evidence is available and the memory of witnesses is still fresh.”⁷ (footnotes omitted)

64. In summary, the current state of the law is that the Constitutional Court accepts that time bar provisions infringe the right to access to justice and has cautioned that all statutory time bars should face judicial scrutiny. When undertaking the limitations analysis in respect of various other statutory time bars, the Courts have engaged in a careful weighing of interests balancing the right to access to justice with factors such as the length of the period, the simplicity of the particular claims procedure, the need for proper administration of public funds and the purpose of the time bar to prevent inordinate delay and preserve the quality of adjudication. In every case, the Court must determine whether the particular range and terms of the time-bar provision are compatible with the right to access to justice.

65. The Constitutional Court has accepted that the Prescription Act operates to limit the right to access to justice, but the Court has not been required to conduct the limitation analysis required to make a determination on its constitutionality. It therefore remains an open question as to whether the three year prescription period for civil debts is reasonable and justifiable as contemplated in section 36.

The Prescription of Civil Debt arising from Sexual Offences:

66. The jurisprudence applicable to time bar provisions generally, and the provisions of the Prescription Act specifically, applies equally to the prescription of civil debts arising from sexual offences

67. In Bothma v Els,⁸ the Constitutional Court held that when considering whether to grant a stay of private prosecution of a sexual offence a court must take into account the nature of the offence. Sachs J held:

“Society demands a degree of repose for its members. People should be able to get on with their lives, with the ability to redeem the misconduct of their early years. To prosecute someone for shop-lifting more than a decade after the event could be unfair in itself, even if an impeccable eyewitness suddenly came forward, or evidence proved the theft beyond a reasonable doubt. Everything will depend upon the circumstances. All the relevant factors would have to be weighed on a case-by-case basis. And of central significance will always be the nature of the offence. The less grave the breach of the law, the less fair will it be to require the accused to bear the consequences of the delay. The more serious the offence, the greater the need for fairness to the public and the complainant by ensuring that the matter goes to trial. As the popular saying tells us “Molato ga o bole” (Setswana) or “ical’aliboli” (isiZulu) – there are some crimes that do not go away

68. Section 11 of the Prescription Act imposes different prescription periods for different kinds of civil debts and different kinds of debtors. A thirty year prescription periods applies to secured debts, judgment debts, debts arising from taxation, and debts owed to the State in respect of mining rights. A fifteen year prescription period applies to any debt owed to the State arising out of the loan of money or sale or lease of land by the State. A six year period applies in respect of a debt arising from a bill of exchange or other negotiable instrument or from a notarial contract.

69. Outside of these categories of debts, the Prescription Act treats all remaining civil debts the same. There is a prescription period of three years regardless of whether the conduct giving rise to the claim for delictual damages was traumatic sexual assault causing serious bodily and psychological harm, or the failure to pay an invoice for services rendered.
70. Section 12(4) delays the commencement of the prescription period for debts arising from sexual offences, but only if the plaintiff can demonstrate that they were unable to institute the proceedings for a period of time. Apart from this, prescription operates in the normal way for these civil debts.
71. It must be considered whether the curtailment of the right to access to justice, and the state's obligation to assist people to vindicate their constitutional rights through private law remedies, is reasonable and justifiable under section 36 of the Constitution.
72. Many of the same factors considered by the courts in the limitation analysis of time bar provisions apply equally when considering the infringements in the context of sexual offences.
73. The class of cases affected by prescription where the debt arises from a sexual offence are a unique class of case that requires 'peculiar sensitivity'. The Constitutional Court and Supreme Court of Appeal have consistently found that a different approach and standard is required when considering the application of time-bar provisions to conduct constituting sexual offences. More than 15 years ago, the SCA in Van Zijl recognised the sui generis sequelae that flows from chronic child abuse, which inhibits a victim's ability to seek redress for the violence⁹. The SCA held that as a result of the particular nature of sexual abuse and its consequences, "[a]ll these factors call for a peculiar sensitivity when applying statutory time limits to proceedings arising from sexual abuse committed against a child during the period in question"¹⁰.
74. Civil claims arising from conduct that constitutes a sexual offence have a number of unique features:

⁹ Van Zijl, para 14

¹⁰ Van Zijl, para 7

74.1 It is a class of case that is characterised by an inability of victims to timeously seek criminal or civil redress. Since the SCA's decision in Van Zijl, and the introduction of section 12(4) in the Prescription Act, a significant amount of research and evidence is now available which shows that most survivors of sexual violence do not come forward and seek redress due to "rape trauma syndrome, the now recognised patterns of emotional, physical, cognitive and behavioural disturbances".¹¹ The Constitutional Court in Levenstein concluded that "[a]ll these features of survival of sexual trauma make it rational to be reluctant to report and to avoid reporting."¹² The Court recognised that certain characteristics of sexual violence (such as secrecy, fear and shame) make it feel and seem impossible for victims to come forward and assert their rights.¹³ The Court held at paragraph 57:

"All these features of survival of sexual trauma make it rational to be reluctant to report and to avoid reporting. And this is before even considering the effect of rape trauma syndrome, the now recognised patterns of emotional, physical, cognitive and behavioural disturbances that approximately one in three survivors of sexual assault develop. Even if a survivor is fully aware that she was abused, she naturally weighs up the possibility of reprisals from the perpetrator together with the possible lack of support from the police and statistically small eventuality that reporting will actually, eventually, result in a conviction in a criminal court."

74.2 The conduct giving rise to the debt implicates a number of constitutional rights. Sexual violence implicates a number of rights in the Bill of Rights including sections 9, 10, 11, 12 and 28.¹⁴

¹¹ Levenstein, paras 54-58

¹² Levenstein, para 57

¹³ Levenstein, para 56

¹⁴ F v Minister of Safety and Security and Another 2012 (1) SA 536 (CC) at para 56

Section 9(1) and 9(2): Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law. Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms

Section 10: Everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected.

Section 11: Everyone has the right to life.

Section 12(1)(c); Everyone has the right to freedom and security of the person, which includes the right to be free from all forms of violence from either public or private sources and not to be treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way.

Section 12(2)(b): Everyone has the right to bodily and psychological integrity, which includes the right to security in and control over their body.

Section 28: Every child has the right to be protected from maltreatment, neglect, abuse or degradation. A child's best interests are of paramount importance in every matter concerning the child.

74.3 The state bears an obligation to assist victims of the conduct to gain both civil and criminal redress. Section 7(2) of the Constitution imposes a duty on the state to “respect, protect, promote and fulfil” the rights in the Bill of Rights. This obligation is positive, direct, and powerful.¹⁵ The state’s duty extends beyond its own action, and it must also take steps to protect these rights against damaging acts that may be perpetrated by private parties.¹⁶

74.4 Lastly, it is a class of case where the institution of civil proceedings is an important mechanism for protecting and vindicating constitutional rights. Civil claims may also protect constitutional rights by acting as a deterrent. The Constitutional Court has accepted that private-law delictual remedies serve to protect and enforce a constitutionally entrenched fundamental right.¹⁷ Civil claims can be an effective response to the infringement of constitutional rights caused by conduct that constitutes a sexual offence. This is particularly so in light of the practical difficulties many survivors face in ensuring criminal charges are effectively investigated and prosecuted. The laws, practices and procedures governing civil actions have the ability to either obstruct or facilitate the protection and enforcement of fundamental rights. Prescription provisions that apply without the necessary sensitivity to the unique nature of claims arising from sexual conduct act to obstruct the vindication of constitutional rights through delictual remedies.

75. These unique features of civil debts arising from sexual offences mean that in many cases survivors of sexual assault do not receive a real and fair initial opportunity to exercise their right to access to justice before prescription commences to run, and the three-year period lapses

76. The infringement of the right to access to justice on this category of debtors is particularly grievous in light of the many constitutional rights implicated by sexual offences.

77. While the current section 12(4) delays prescription on account of psychological condition, or on account of intellectual disability, disorder or incapacity in terms of the proposed amendment in the current Bill, all the other factors discussed above and recognised in Levenstein which lead to delay in reporting, and by implication would lead to delays in instituting civil proceedings are not taken into account. The realities of the psychological and societal barriers facing sexual violence victims to reporting and instituting civil claims are reinforced by prescription periods.

78. The concept of prescription of sexual offences in all criminal matters has been accepted as not applicable or appropriate. The reason for this is that sexual offences are sufficiently serious enough for them not to prescribe.
79. It was accepted in the CC Levenstein judgement that there are numerous reasons why victims do not report the offence immediately and may delay that reporting for as long as more than 20 years.
80. Given that the CC has accepted this, it is inappropriate that a limitation is placed on civil prescription of 3 years, even with the provisions of delay in section 12(4).
81. Section 12(4) currently recognises that sexual offences are a particular category of offence that requires special arrangements to allow for the institution of civil proceedings outside of the normal 3-year prescription period.
82. However, in practice, where a victim institutes civil proceeding for damages arising from a sexual offence more than 3 years after the incident, the victim as plaintiff bears an evidentiary burden to show that she was unable to institute proceedings within 3 years due to her mental or psychological condition.
83. This places both a legal and emotional burden on the victim. With the amendment to section 18 of the Criminal Procedure Act, it is recognised that to put any limitation on the reporting of any sexual offence for the purposes of instituting a criminal prosecution is unconstitutional. We submit that this is the opportune time for Parliament to extend the same rationale to the institution of civil proceedings for a debt arising from a sexual offence.
- 84. Section 12 should therefore be amended to reflect that prescription shall not commence to run in respect of a debt based on the commission of a sexual offence.
