Between 1994 to date, the courts have removed some of the unconstitutional consequences against Muslim women on a piecemeal and limited basis. However, the default position remains one of exclusion and marginalisation. The law currently affords only limited recognition to spouses in Muslim marriages. There is a critical need for legislative recognition, as Muslim women remain marginalised and are treated unfairly because their religious marriages are not legally recognised.